STRALIAN MUTUAL FIRE IN

advanced foreign countries, our readers are aware that in addition to all provision for private tuition and secondary and higher education, the average daily attendance at our elementary schools should approach very near the proportion of seven-tenths of the entire population. To attain that standard there ought to have been 30,000 pupils in regular attendance during last December quarter, than the number reported by the department. The reason for the comparatively trifling relative increase is simply that the machinery provided by law has not yet been brought into full operation. Sir JOHN ROBERTSON believes in making haste slowly, especially in regard to the compulsory power placed in his hands. He says in his report,—"The matter required delicate handling. The mode of giving effect to the law needed to be mild and judicious, calculating largely upon the effect of persuasion by officers possessing judgment and discrimination, together with equability of temper." There he is quite right, for equability of temper is a great thing, and it would often prove exceedingly valuable in "any place." Nobody expressed any view on the compulsory law when it was passed that either school or truuant officers would be sent storming and raging among the houses of the people to draw the children to school and the parents to prison. The way of working a compulsory law, as we to make it at once gentle and effective, is sufficiently well known now from the experience of England, Victoria, New Zealand, and Queensland, not to cite other examples. In England not half a dozen cases of hardship have occurred out of hundreds of thousands of infants dealt with by the School Boards. Sir JOHN RUSSELL has made his rule gentle by simply abdicating his functions. It is well to spare the feelings of the parent, but it is not well to sacrifice the rights of the child. The

The first and most essential thing for an increased attendance is increased accommodation. Schools must be built where none exist now, and others must be enlarged. The total expenditure for the whole of last year was £281,757, and of this sum about £100,000 was on account of buildings, repairs, rent, and furniture. The report says:—In various ways school accommodation was provided for an enrolment of 21,900 children. Forty-eight new school buildings were opened, twenty-four buildings were rented, and two school tents were provided. So far, this is well; but it falls far short of meeting the wants of the colony. In many cases temporary accommodation will be sufficient, where there is a migratory population; but there is a legitimate demand for permanent buildings far in advance of our present supply. These buildings should be healthy, substantial, architecturally beautiful, and in accordance with modern ideas, and they may be all this without being extravagantly costly. Good forms are as cheap as bad ones, often cheaper, and they serve their purpose better. The whole expenditure on our primary schools last year was equal to 10s. 2d. per head of the mean population. For the sake of universal education the public will gladly bear that burden, for it secures equivalent benefits available for every family in the land. Sir JOHN ROBINSON has had an immense amount of labour in preparing the new regulations and getting his machinery ready for work. His first report will form a new departure in the educational history of the colony. It contains the various sets of regulations he has made for the different classes of schools and branches of the service, and these require studying scrutiny. Our most pressing need is to study the provisions for primary instruction.

tion all over the colony, those for secondary and higher instruction will soon follow. Hitherto, since the new Act passed, all have been preparation; but this year gigantic strides should be made in overtaking the educational necessities of the colony.

Recent telegrams from London have informed us that Mr. BRADLAUGH, having failed in his appeal to the House of Lords against the adverse decision of the Court below, whereby he had been subjected to penalties for illegally sitting in the House of Commons, had resigned his seat, had solicited his late constituents to again elect him, and has been elected. The information is interesting from several points of view, by reason of its bearing upon the relations between statutory law and Parliamentary privilege, and as marking a stage in the progress of events by which a state, which are supposed to carry with them a sort of religious influence or authority, are gradually being superseded by atheism or declarations, the truth of which is protected by reference to punishments inflicted by the secular power. So far as Mr. BRADLAUGH is personally concerned, his position is not altered.

tion is not improved by the mere fact of his being once more elected. He must comply with the law as to oaths before taking his seat, or should he with the permission of the House again take his seat without obeying the law, he will again render himself liable to be sued, and subject himself to pains and penalties.

Nearly a year has passed since the meeting of the Imperial Parliament at which Mr. BRADLAUGH, having been duly elected, claimed exemption from the oath which by law members are required to take before sitting and voting in the House of Commons. The law as to the oaths has been modified and relaxed in the course of years; but the relaxation has been effected by the process of legislation. By straining a point, the House in 1863, allowed Mr. PEARCE, a Quaker, to take his seat after making an affirmation. Statutes that gave relief to Quakers in other matters were interpreted in that case as if they had been applicable to the taking of the oath in Parliament. But the House would not act upon that precedent in the case of Mr. JOWE, and their admission was the result of a powerful and at last successful attempt to alter the law in their favour. But the law o assumptions did not cover Mr. BRADLAUGH's case, and his admission was the result of a resolution moved by Mr. GLADSTONE permitting members who preferred affirmations to

THE OPENING

TUESDAY MORNING,
10th April, 1881.

MRS THOMAS AND SONS, PAINTER & DECORATOR ONLY.

At the residence of Mrs Thomas, at the corner of the Palace Entomium.

On the whole of our business career, we have secured every branch of our art, by diligent and assiduous labour, the purchase of first-class materials, and the employment of such workmen as are capable of executing all modern styles of painting and decorating in perfection. Each successive extension has furnished us with ample opportunity of increasing our stock of colours, and the quality of our work, so that we are enabled to execute all orders in the most perfect manner. We are sensible of the cordial patronage which has been bestowed upon us, which has constituted us one of the leading firms in the colony, and we trust that our sincere thanks, we would also come forward to our friends and customers, who will assist us in the future, as heretofore, make their choice of us.

OUR BERLIN LETTER.

BERLIN, FEBRUARY 24.

The German Parliament opened a week ago, and the opportunity has not been missed to give, in the speech of the Throne, the most peaceful assurance to the world at large. The Emperor hopes even that a conflict between Turkey and Greece will be avoided, and that in the eventuality of a war breaking out between these two States, the peace amongst the Great Powers would be preserved. The dark auspices under which the New Year began, have, therefore, been somewhat cleared up, and this very much desired fact has partly been accomplished through the attitude which the English Cabinet took during the last few months. Mr. Goschen, the English Ambassador at Constantinople, was commissioned by his chief, Lord Granville, to visit, during his return to the Turkish capital, both Berlin and Vienna, in order to hold important conferences with Prince Bismarck, the German Chancellor, and with Baron Haymerle, the Austrian Minister of Foreign Affairs. It just happened that Count von Hayfied, the German Ambassador at the Porte, was at the same time present in Berlin, and Prince Bismarck could thus have the best information on the real state of affairs in the East from two statesmen who are both very well acquainted with everything that is going on in the Turkish Empire. It is well known that the English Cabinet had made up their minds to stand on the resolution of the last Berlin Conference, and that they did not wish to allow any change of these resolutions. Mr. Goschen came here with the task of explaining to Prince Bismarck the opinions which reign in the English Cabinet on the subject of the Eastern question, and to see whether Germany was inclined to support the British Cabinet in these resolutions. Though it has been too often asserted that the European concord regarding the regulations of Eastern affairs was still existing, it was of course a mere fiction, and that there still existed a difference without the removal of which no negotiations could be opened. Mr. Goschen tried to remove these differences in his friendly and personal intercourse with the leading statesmen of Germany and Austria, and he was indeed successful, in as far as he met with general sympathy for his endeavours to preserve the general peace, and to facilitate all peaceful schemes necessary for the solution of the Greek-Turkish conflict. Mr. Goschen was received by Lord Otto Russell, the English Ambassador, and his staff, and had several conferences with Prince Bismarck, and was also received by Emperor William and the Crown Prince. The main object of all these interviews was to effect a compromise between the opposing parties and to find acceptable substitutes for some of the decisions of the Berlin Conference. Prince Bismarck was not disinclined to take upon himself again the role of the "honest broker," and to commission the Count von Hayfied to use all his influence at Constantinople in order to convince the Porte that it is necessary for her to have peace conclusions. The meeting between Mr. Goschen and the German Ambassador was therefore, so far, really successful, as it was agreed upon that negotiations should recommence at Constantinople, and that each Ambassador should have an interview with the representatives of the Porte in order to present to them the Turkish Government's great concessions which seem indispensable for a favourable result. After these separate interviews, the Ambassadors will, amongst themselves, discuss the matter, and will send in reports to their respective Governments. This arrangement also shows that a long time will still pass before any practical result can be achieved, but as the Powers have openly declared to the Porte that it would be responsible for the very serious events which would follow if it tried to elude the counsels given by the Berlin Congress and Conference, it is to be hoped that the outbreak of hostilities will be avoided. Now all the Ambassadors have returned to Constantinople, and they have already received several times from the Sultan and his Ministers in order to discuss these proposals, but nothing has as yet been finally settled. Though the Powers differ in opinion about many points regarding the principles to be followed, and also about the details, they seem at least to have agreed so far that Janina must be returned to Turkey, and that in Thessaly more concessions must be made to Greece beyond the line proposed by the Berlin Conference. The practical question, therefore, is now how much territory the Porte will give up rather than go to war, and how much Greece will accept. The finances of both States are in no way brilliant, and it would indeed be more profitable for both to come to a peaceful understanding, but at present the war fever is still powerful in both quarters. The Porte is continuing preparations for war and strengthening the Turkish armaments; and the last news from Constantinople announces that almost every day one or more ships with troops are sent to the coast, and that the armed manouvres in Athens and the war party is likewise more powerful, and the diplomats will therefore have a very heavy task if they want to succeed in preserving the general peace of Europe.

And then, it must be owned that by such proceedings the State has been deprived of some of its most useful and most learned men, who are now bound to live in retirement and in comparative inactivity. We have seen how the former Vice-Chancellor, Mr. Delbrück, was forced to resign on account of his unwillingness to follow his master in the working of his scheme, and we have seen how the Ministers Camphor, Falk, and others, were sacrificed by Prince Bismarck without a second thought, and how they were treated with the greatest ingratitude by their former colleagues. Now, a new and quite unexpected struggle has been opened a few days ago by the Prince against Count Palenbourg, the Minister of the Home Affairs. Prince Bismarck was engaged in consideration of an administrative competence law for the provinces, which was sent in by the Chamber of Deputies, with several amendments of no particular significance. The Minister of the Interior, who had to defend the bill proposed to the House, the acceptance of which modifications would be to the Chamber, was scarcely had Count Palenbourg, again took his seat and read a paper, in which the Chancellor contradicted and disavowed in the most compromising way the words and views of the Home Minister. This new way of treating a colleague, and of making an appeal to Parliament, created course the greatest excitement in the House. Count Palenbourg himself could at first not understand the real meaning of this proceeding. The Count resolved at once to give in his resignation, and, though the Emperor and the Crown Prince have been anxious to arrange a rapprochement between the Chancellor and Count Palenbourg, later seems not in the least inclined to remain in an office in which he could run the risk of being again treated like a schoolboy found at fault by his master. Prince Bismarck has only a few days ago declared in the Chamber of Deputies that he would never again speak of resigning his post, and that he would remain in his office until the day of his death. It is therefore clear that Count Palenbourg will be in their power to keep up his fight against the Chancellor. Affairs will certainly go on in this manner as long as the Emperor lives; but the Crown Prince will find it no easy task to keep together all those elements which at present seem only to be united by the strong will of one single man.

The anti-Jewish agitation still flourishes and takes large dimensions every day. It is easy to understand that the extreme elements on both sides make great mistakes in assessing each other, and the struggle is conducted in a most unpropitious manner. Particularly some newspapers which are in the hands of the Jews are very compromising, and thus do all in their power to keep up the fight against the Chancellor. The anti-Jewish agitation has taken the form of an insurrection. Several days ago the synagogue of New Berlin, a town in Pomerania, of about 10,000 souls, was destroyed by fire, and all Jewish journals declared that this incident was caused by anti-semitic leaders, and made the secret attacks against the Chancellor, and the anti-semitic agitation, shortly afterwards it was declared that the congregation was not occasioned by human hands. From such episodes alone it can be seen what feelings of hatred exist between the two parties.

From Munich, the capital of Bavaria, very sad news reached us the other day. At a festival arranged by the young artists and scholars of the University of Munich, in the hall of the University, a young man, named by a dozen of artists disguised as Equivocals, caught fire from a match used for lighting a cigar. The costumes of the unfortunate young man, who were entirely draped in calico, also caught fire at once, and the flames were so quickly spreading around him that the poor man could not be saved. Eight young artists and scholars, who were standing near him, were wounded, and their lives are in danger. There were more than two thousand persons in the hall when the accident occurred, and it is quite a miracle that the accident has not taken greater dimensions. This deplorable misfortune has indeed excited very much sympathy in all the artistic circles here.

The death of Thomas Carlyle has been received everywhere in Germany with grief, and all leading papers have devoted long articles to the great English author who has written the best history of Frederick the Great and who has by his work alone fully entitled himself to the gratitude of Germany. The misfortune of Carlyle will certainly never fade away in this country.

Great interest is given here to the war against the Boers in the Transvaal, and though sympathies exist and are expressed for the brave colonists, the general feeling nevertheless protests that the attitude of the English Government is really justified, and that the Boers will have no reason to complain of the consequences of their rebellion.

In my last letter I mentioned to you that the carnival is this year much more brilliant than usual. Festivities at Court, in the Embassies, and in all the aristocratic families, are hunting each other; and above all, the great and grand preparations for the Royal wedding of the Prince and Princess Victoria, which is to take place in a few days. The streets of the city are already being decorated, and for the last two days Royal guests have arrived from near and far who come to assist the wedding ceremony. All the Sovereigns who come not in person, are sending special envoys to the occasion, and the bodies of the whole principal nobility is coming in crowds to the capital to witness the event. All the hotels are overcrowded, all the windows in the Unter den Linden are let for the day of the entrance of the Princess, and great joy prevails everywhere. The Emperor, particularly, is very happy that he is granted the blessing of marriage by his eldest grandson, and particularly the Princess Augusta Victoria is said to be one of the most amiable princesses of the day. In my next letter I will give you a detailed account and description of all the festivities, which will certainly be interesting to the many of our compatriots who have found a home in Australia.
